

Protestant Baptism in a Private Chapel (c. 1570)

Abstract

Baptism is a Christian initiation ritual whereby the baptized person is accepted into the church and the community of believers. In the sixteenth century, the necessity of baptism for salvation was discussed within the Christian community and was disputed depending on the denomination, but except for individual Reformation groups (such as the Anabaptists), all denominations adhered to infant baptism and baptism as a rite of admission into the community. The picture shows a Protestant baptism in the presence of important parishioners and a broad public.

Source

Source: Protestant Baptism in a Private Chapel. Painting by an unknown Regensburg master, c. 1570. Reprinted in Paul Münch, Lebensformen in der Frühen Neuzeit. Frankfurt am Main/Berlin, 1998, Illustration 20 (unpaginated).

Museen der Stadt Regensburg. Photo: Michael Preischl

Recommended Citation: Protestant Baptism in a Private Chapel (c. 1570), published in: German History Intersections, <<https://germanhistory-intersections.org/en/germanness/ghis:image-229>> [May 04, 2024].